Many of the people who have told their stories in this book were rescued from slavery because a neighbor, friend, coworker, or client noticed that their situation seemed unusual or exploitative. With the aid of a stranger or a friend’s courage and intuition, many survivors are able to escape the most gruesome conditions. The list of potential warning signs given here might alert you to the possibility that someone is enslaved.¹ Though any one of these conditions might not indicate slavery, each one of them is a sign that should be an alert to abuse, exploitation, and even possible human trafficking.

Be alert if a person

1. Appears to be working without pay.
2. Is not free to change employers.
3. Is being held against his or her will.
4. Shows signs of employer abuse, either mental or physical.
5. Appears to be malnourished among people who are not.
6. Wears the same clothes every day or does not appear to own many personal possessions.
7. Is not allowed to leave his or her home.
8. Is being watched or followed when he or she leaves home.
9. Works an excessive number of hours.
10. Is afraid to discuss himself or his work situation.
11. Has been abused or threatened for refusing to work.
12. Has an unquantifiable debt related to his or her work situation.
13. Has been transported across national borders.
