Like any author of a book like this, I owe a great deal of gratitude to a multitude of people. My deep gratitude to Kris Mullendore, former ADA, current professor, and good friend, who read and responded at great length to early as well as late versions of the chapters of this book. Her meticulous and keen comments helped me turn the book around at early stages and correct and polish legal arguments in the final product. My deep appreciation also goes to Lynn Chancer, for working with me so that we would both get published by a company from our “top ten” wish list and for offering me unswerving encouragement and endless support.

My sincere appreciation goes to Deborah Schneider, literary agent (and sister) extraordinaire, who suggested so many contract changes that my editor became fearful of losing me as an author. My appreciation also goes to the late John Michel, my original editor at Columbia, who believed in this project so strongly that he wrote me from his hospital bed despite his grave suffering. My gratitude goes as well to my current editor, Lauren Dockett, for picking up my manuscript midstream and facilitating the successful completion of this project. And my sincere appreciation goes to the copy editor of this book, Sarah St. Onge, for her keen eye and mind.
I would also like to express my gratitude to two almost editors: George Ritzer, of Lexington Press, who promoted the earliest version of this work, and Elizabeth Knoll, of Harvard University Press, both for showing me the value of being focused and for promoting my confidence in pursuing this endeavor.

My heartfelt gratitude goes to Claire Renzetti, who serves as a role model of commitment to the profession, to those who work within it, and to the ideals of justice and equality. My profound thanks also to Walter DeKeserderdy, for his insightful comments as well as his model of productive commitment to ending “woman abuse” in all its forms and manifestations.

Others deserve special recognition, too. Emily Lenning tirelessly tracked down sources and annotated articles for this book. Amanda Counts deserves gratitude for her ever ready, thorough help with Web work and annotations. Drew Humphries’ interest, encouragement, and enthusiasm helped spur me on. Marjorie Zatz’s admiration for my perseverance in perfecting the manuscript helped keep me going. Laura Fishman’s model of determination in the face of obstacles shored up my own resolve.

Other colleagues, too, like Nicole (Nicky) Hahn Rafter, Susan Miller, and Kim Cook, all helped to advance this work in their own significant ways. Lewis Walker and Pat Martin (cochairs) and David Hartmann (current chair) of the Department of Sociology, Ronald Kramer (director, Criminal Justice Program), Douglas Ferraro and Elise Jorgens (former deans of the College of Arts and Sciences), and Subhash Sonnad (professor and chair of the Sabbatical Leave Committee), all of Western Michigan University, merit special thanks for their tangible support in the form of giving me release time to write. Karen Rice deserves special mention, too, for her indefatigable cataloging of references as well as other typing and assistance that helped bring this project to fruition.

My gratitude also goes to Kathy Savage, the epitome of rape victim turned survivor and fighter, who resolutely pursued one of the first successful test cases of using DNA evidence to prosecute a rapist, and to all the others, both known and unknown to me personally, who, in an amazing multitude of ways, fight and survive the horror and trauma of rape and sexual assault victimization.

My parents, John and Marilyn, and my sister DonnaLee, and special friends like Pat Peppler and Bob Deets all deserve special recognition, too, for staying with me, schlepping me around, and even feeding me when I wasn’t able because of several surgeries. And my further thanks go to so many others who understood my “booking” and seemingly perpetual absence.

I must also acknowledge my late Satanya and my Querida Rudita (aka Rudi), who lay ever by my side, patiently and unendingly waiting, or walking and wading (obliviously, with Post-its stuck to their fur) through the piles and piles of drafts, rewrites, reorganizations, reconceptualizations, and so forth, over the years it took to complete this work.

Finally let me share a quote from Churchill that is posted on my computer, my refrigerator, my office desk, and elsewhere: “Writing a book is an adventure. To begin with, it is a toy and an amusement; then it becomes a mistress, and then it becomes a master, and then a tyrant. The last phase is that just as you are about to be reconciled to your servitude, you kill the monster, and fling him out to the public” (Rhodes James 1974: 7883).
