ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Our interest in writing a book about the contributions of relational theories to clinical social work practice grew out of our experiences as clinicians, teachers, and supervisors. We wanted to synthesize the concepts we have found useful in recent years and to show their application to clinical practice with a range of individuals and problems. We appreciate the many clients, students, and supervisees who have shared their struggles with us and from whom we have learned a great deal in the process of our work together.

Another major impetus to our taking on this challenging project was our leadership (Eda G. Goldstein as cochair with Dr. David Phillips) and participation (Dennis Miehls and Shoshana Ringel as members) in the National Study Group of the American Association for Psychoanalysis in Clinical Social Work (AAPCSW, formerly the National Committee on Psychoanalysis in Clinical Social Work) from 2005 to 2008. The professional colleagues who made up the Study Group joined our commitment to providing social work students, classroom instructors, fieldwork supervisors, and other practitioners with a book that encompassed the full range of psychoanalytic relational thinking and its use in today’s practice arenas. We thank Marsha Wineburgh, past president of AAPCSW, who supported our efforts, and our colleagues in the Study Group, who encouraged us and contributed their thinking as we developed our ideas.

Writing this book has been a rewarding collaboration. The three authors, who reside in different geographic areas, had not worked together previously. When we began the writing, we did not know how intellectually stimulating and smooth the writing task would be. We believe that the book is much richer than it would have been had each of us written on his or her own. Our collaboration has been enjoyable and lightened the load. Although the three of us had some role in all the chapters, each of us took the major responsibility for certain chapters (Eda G. Goldstein for the introduction and chapters 1, 5, 6, and 7; Dennis Miehls for chapters 2, 9, 10, and 11 and the epilogue; and Shoshana Ringel for chapters 3, 4, and 8, with some assistance from Eda G. Goldstein on chapter 4). Likewise, while all of us contributed case examples in our respective chapters, Dennis Miehls provided numerous case vignettes for chapters 6 and 7.

We thank Lauren Dockett, executive editor of Columbia University Press, for her enthusiasm and valuable assistance in shepherding this volume through all phases of the publication process.

Numerous family members, friends, and colleagues were particularly supportive during the writing. Individually, we are grateful to the following people:

Eda G. Goldstein—I am fortunate to have been associated with New York University’s Silver School of Social Work, which has played a vital role in clinical social work education over many years. My colleagues on the social work practice faculty have been an important source of encouragement, and their ongoing dedication to educating students in contemporary psychodynamic theories and practice principles has provided a supportive environment. I am especially thankful for the unwavering support of my partner, Patricia A. Petrocelli, who had to endure my considerable involvement in writing. I am also grateful to the many friends who showed an interest in what I was doing.

Dennis Miehls—I acknowledge my colleagues at Smith College’s School for Social Work for continuing to uphold the highest standards in clinical social work education in our master’s and doctoral programs. Many colleagues offer support and enthusiasm for my writing projects. I am indebted to the Smith College School for Social Work resident faculty and to a number of adjunct faculty who offer ongoing stimulating dialogues about curriculum content that enrich my thinking. I appreciate the support of Dr. Carolyn Jacobs, dean of Smith College’s School for Social Work, who authorized on behalf of the college a sabbatical leave that helped me concentrate on writing. My success in this project and others is largely attributable to my partner, Beth, who is a steady and loving anchor as I complete many professional activities. I also attribute my success to my son James and his partner Alison, who offer support and listen at exactly the right time.

Shoshana Ringel—I would like to acknowledge the University of Maryland School of Social Work for their appreciation of my clinical contributions and for granting me tenure. I also thank Roy for his patience, loyalty, and unconditional support, and my students Rebecca Green, Jessica Myers, John Laur, Miko Masterson, and Jesse Callan for their contribution of valuable clinical material.
