A number of individuals provided much-appreciated assistance and support during the preparation of this book. We are grateful to the late John Michel, who until his untimely death in 2005 was senior executive editor at Columbia University Press. John was not only our editor but a good friend, as he was to so many others. We also wish to thank Lauren Dockett, executive editor, for her efficiency and professionalism during the short time we have worked with her, as well as our copyeditor, Jan McInroy, for her meticulous attention to detail and consummate professionalism. We thank our respective deans, Phyllis I. Vroom of the Wayne State University School of Social Work and Jesse Harris of the University of Maryland School of Social Work, for their willingness to support our research. Last, but most assuredly not least, we express gratitude to our psychotherapy patients, who have so enriched our understanding of attachment within a clinical context, and to our graduate students, whose penetrating questions about the nature of attachment have challenged us to write this book.

Two chapters in this book contain clinical case material drawn from previously published works. Several of the brief clinical vignettes used in chapter 5 are based on cases that originally appeared in Jerrold Brandell’s book Of Mice and Metaphors: Therapeutic Storytelling with Children, published in