ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book grew out of our personal experiences with loss; our losses of friends, colleagues, and family members; and our professional commitment to prepare social workers to work effectively with individuals, families, and communities grieving loss across the life span. The questions and concerns of the bereaved have made the need for this book clear to us and sustained us when other work and family demands interfered with writing. We are grateful for what we have learned from the bereaved, the students in our classes, and colleagues.

We greatly appreciate the support of numerous colleagues and friends who encouraged us to write this book. Our special thanks go to Cynthia Tomik, University of Washington, and Dr. Virginia Richardson, Ohio State University, for their insightful reviews of drafts of the manuscript, and Lynn Carrigan, who eagerly awaits this book for her course on multicultural and multigenerational approaches to healing grief/loss at the University of Washington’s School of Social Work. Their external validation assured us that this book would indeed contribute to the profession. Don Armstrong, the director of Aging and Disability Services, Jewish Family Service, provided information about Jewish traditions surrounding death and grief.

I specifically want to acknowledge Rick Reamer, a professor at the School of Social Work, Rhode Island College, and the special editor of the Social Work Series, and the late John Michel, who was a senior editor at Columbia University Press, both of whom gave me the courage and freedom to change plans and write this book and who were supportive throughout the long writing process.

My special appreciation goes to my son, Kevin, who shows increasing wisdom and empathy to others who experience major losses, and to my daughter, Mani, who taught me about what is important to children who grieve. I will always cherish my friends and colleagues at the University of Washington and across the country who have listened sensitively and openly during my intense periods of grief and supported my personal and professional growth through the process of living through loss.

I, too, am grateful to all those who provided constructive reviews of manuscript drafts and to the editors at Columbia University Press.

I wish to acknowledge my students who have convinced me of the need for this text through their enthusiastic desire to gain the knowledge and skills necessary to respond to their and their clients’ pain resulting from traumatic events, difficult life experiences, and a variety of social problems. I am encouraged by witnessing these students’ compassion, caring, and commitment. Many of them have chosen their work in order to teach other professionals culturally relevant and developmentally appropriate strategies for addressing grief.

I express my deepest gratitude and affection to my mother, Marge Collins; my sisters, Margie, Barbara, Janet, and Mary; and my brothers, Buddy and Jimmy, for their great influence on my understanding of grief, loss, resilience, growth, caring, and love. My most valued and important source of support is my partner, Jim. Without his tireless encouragement and willingness to be fully engaged in virtually all the responsibilities associated with raising a family and running a household, I would not have been able to carry out my academic activities. My children, Jenner and Clariel, have been incredibly patient with my demanding work schedule and allow me to cherish the very rich quality time we spend together.

Finally, I wish to express my deepest appreciation to Domo Geshe Rinpoche, my spiritual teacher.
