I cannot adequately express my deep gratitude to the case managers, staff, and consumers at High County Mental Health Center. They allowed me into their lives, public and private, often while they faced pressing deadlines and intractable problems. And, unfortunately, because I must protect their privacy, they cannot be personally acknowledged for their many insights and sacrifices.

I owe a great deal to the faculty and students at the University of Chicago and the School of Social Service Administration (SSA) for creating an intellectual environment that allowed me to explore the broader historical, sociological, and anthropological implications of social work practice. In particular, I wish to thank Leora Auslander, Evelyn Brodkin, Larry Cohen, Elizabeth Durkin, Sarah Gehlert, Penny Johnson, Susan Lambert, Martha Nussbaum, Elsie Pinkston, William Pollak, Melissa Roderick, Margaret Rosenheim, Pat Selmi, Kristi Shook, William Sites, Brenda Smith, George Steinmetz, Michael Sosin, Susan Stone, and Jane Yamaguchi. I am especially grateful to Jeanne Marsh, Sharon Berlin, and Andrew Apter for their encouragement and their thoughtful and timely comments on my evolving project.

I am also deeply indebted to the many friends and colleagues who have provided constant advice and encouragement over many years, most especially Morteza Ardebili, Barbara Levy Simon, Ilga Svechs, Donald Stull, Janis Jenkins, Ann Kuckelman Cobb, Steve Koester, and Rush Rankin. In particular, Morteza Ardebili introduced me to critical realism fifteen years ago.
I have consulted my good friend Robert Gross many times, and I thank him for an inspiring and truly interdisciplinary mind. I have greatly benefited from the work of Philippe Bourgois, whose commitment to understanding street-level and local knowledge is original and remarkable.

I want to thank my mother, Rita Wietharn Floersch, and my father, Raymond Floersch, for encouraging me to follow my desires; they also contributed much toward meeting my most basic needs. And I owe a special thanks to my colleagues at the Mandel School for Applied Social Sciences, Case Western Reserve University, and to John Michel and Sabine Seiler at Columbia University Press.

Finally, Jeffrey Longhofer, my lifelong partner, has made an inestimable difference in my ideas and life by bringing specificity to my thought, depth to my theorizing, and curiosity to my world. I am indebted to his intellectual spirit, grateful for his kindness, and thankful for our everyday mutuality.
MEDS, MONEY, AND MANNERS