ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This volume originates in a conference on the role of theory in contemporary social work practice, sponsored by the School of Social Service Administration at the University of Chicago in May 2007. The participants, leading scholars and practitioners in the field, were asked to address emerging developments in clinical theory from the vantage point of their own scholarship, research, or practice. The ideas and concerns explored over the course of the conference have shaped the chapters in this volume.

I thank the contributors for their thought, care, and generosity of spirit in preparing their accounts, and I thank my colleagues who joined the contributors as participants in the conference, especially Marie Connolly, Sarah Gehlert, Bernece Simon, Sara Taber, and Edwina Uehara. Jeanne Marsh, dean of the School of Social Service Administration, remains steadfast in her support of intellectual life, and I thank her and my colleagues for their ongoing conversation and support of scholarship in all its varied forms. I would like to express my gratitude to James Clark, collaborator on many projects, whose passion for ideas and conversation through the years have deepened my understanding of crucial concerns explored in this volume. It has been a special pleasure to work with Lauren Dockett, our editor at Columbia University Press, who has provided encouragement and support over the course of the project. The volume is dedicated to Sharon Berlin, scholar, teacher, and practitioner, whose contributions to clinical theory over the last quarter-century continue to enrich the field.
