ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The impetus for this project came from John Michel, who was senior executive editor at Columbia University Press. We had worked together on my previous book on field education and I knew John to be a supportive and outstandingly helpful publisher, committed to developing social work literature. As in the past, working with him was always a pleasure and I will remember him with gratitude for his encouragement and guidance through this project. I also want to thank Shelley Reinhardt, senior executive editor, Susan Pensak, senior manuscript editor, and Ann Young, editorial assistant, for continuing to direct this project through its final stages. Their advice is deeply appreciated.

The basis for my learning and thinking about social work practice comes from the many clients I have worked with over the years in a range of practice settings, with a wide variety of problems and issues, using a range of intervention models. These raw practice experiences stimulated reflection and analysis and collegial learning from presentation to my supervisors, consultants, and many experienced professional colleagues, especially Marion Soloway and Janet Tanzer. My work at the Faculty of Social Work, University of Toronto provided enriching learning opportunities as we attempted to articulate the elements in social work practice competence and systematically studied social work processes and effective ways of teaching. I wish to thank all those who have participated with me in these activities. They include colleagues at the Faculty of Social Work with whom I have worked in designing and refining curriculum and the field practicum, especially Roxanne Power and Andrea Litvack. I particularly want to thank my colleague Faye Mishna for reading the manuscript and providing information and suggestions that improved the text. Her constant encouragement and belief in the need for this book was extremely important. Also, I have learned from my coinvestigators in research projects where we have used a range of qualitative and quantitative methods to design studies on various aspects of social work practice — A. K. T. Tsang,
Judith Globerman, and Cheryl Regehr. Through teaching and learning with students in a range of foundation, advanced, and specialized practice courses, with doctoral students in a course on teaching and learning in social work, and with field instructors I have worked with in new field instructor seminars, I have had the opportunity to develop and evaluate ideas presented in this text. Finally, my greatest appreciation goes to my husband Norman Bogo for his thoughtful contributions to the manuscript. As a result of his own experience and wisdom as a clinical psychiatrist and psychotherapist, he has provided endless opportunities for discussion and reflection about our respective professional disciplines and practices.

During preparation of parts of the manuscript I was appointed the inaugural Sandra Rotman Chair in Social Work at the Faculty of Social Work, University of Toronto, which provided support for this work.
