I have had the privilege of learning from many excellent teachers. In college and graduate school, none has been more influential than Charles E. Linblom. Among colleagues and contemporaries, no one has taught me more than Gary Saxonhouse. From the generation of my students, no one has made more of an impression than Daniel Roth. Nonetheless, the responsibility for this book is mine alone, and I absolve the people mentioned above, as well as those mentioned below, from any of it. Indeed, in this book, I have mild to profound disagreements with all.

I thank other friends and colleagues for their support, information, and criticism. They include Katharine Briar-Lawson, Shirley Jones, Hal Lawson, Irene Lurie, Bruce Miroff, Janet Perloff, and Brenda Smith. I thank Richard Sugarman for conveying to me some of his concern with reason and justice. I thank Sara Knapp for numerous discussions and cogent critique. I thank Bernard Sanders for his generous foreword and his public service. I thank John Michel, Irene Pavitt, Rita Bernhard, and the other people at Columbia University Press for their care and professionalism in transforming a manuscript into this book. The memory of the late Richard H. de Lone has been my constant companion.

I thank the numerous secretaries whose patience was exceeded only by their skill. They include Elizabeth Adamo, Cynthia Alexander, Diane Darbyshire, Erin Finnigan, Barbara Gabriel-Catalano, Margaret Pitta, and Lynn Razzano.
