The stories we tell, and the ways that we tell them, are influenced by everyone we’ve ever known, and everything we’ve ever seen, heard, or read. What follows, then, can be only an incomplete list of my indebtedness.

I am most grateful to the mothers, fathers, sons, daughters, sisters, brothers, life partners, and friends whose memoirs form the basis of this study. Without their books mine would not exist.

After close to four decades in the social work profession, I think back to all the stops along the way: Community Service Society, Jewish Home and Hospital, Gay Men’s Health Crisis (GMHC), Lighthouse International, Brookdale Center on Aging, and Columbia University School of Social Work. I have received more from clients than I ever gave, and learned more from students than I ever taught.

First-rate colleagues surrounded me at every turn. Among them were a few who became dear friends: Frances Coyle Brennan, Gertrude Elowitz, Lucy Rosengarten, Barbara Silverstone, Anna (Honey) Zimmer. As the years pass, many who offered wise counsel are gone. I think especially of Daniel Cohen, Rose Goldstein, and Carol H. Meyer—I hear their voices still. Special thanks are due to Harriet Rzetelny, whose insightful comments on early drafts of the book helped immeasurably.
John Michel, at Columbia University Press, was the first person to whom I confided the nascent idea for what was to become my “project.” Although he did not live to see it to fruition, his initial encouragement made all the difference. Shelley Reinhardt’s good cheer and diligence—with the support of manuscript editors Kerri Sullivan and Susan Pensak—got me through the end zone.

Reading about other families brought me closer to my own. I honor my roots: grandmothers Rose Tuck Levinson and Fannie Landsber Burack, who were children of the nineteenth century. I treasure my branches: granddaughters Danielle Nelson and Jennie Rose Nelson, who are children of the twenty-first century. And to the adored trio who grace my own small chunk of space and time in the universe—children Donna Weiss Nelson and Kenneth Weiss, and husband Roy L. Weiss—my deepest thanks and love.

And the end of all our exploring
Will be to arrive where we started
And know the place for the first time.
—T.S. Eliot, “Little Gidding”
