ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

SINCE THE IDEAS in this book have evolved over a number of years, there are an enormous number of wonderful people whose contributions to them have extended over many years and might not initially seem directly related to this book. I readily call to mind Roger R. Miller, who first taught me to value my own ideas; Jean B. Sanville, whose generosity and love of ideas has been invaluable to many areas of my career; Gerald Schamess, who is the most wonderful person in the world with whom to have a dialogue over ideas; Thomas K. Kenemore, who first suggested that I needed a separate concept for the culture created jointly by therapist and client; and Suzanne Whiteley, whose account of her childhood years in Bergen-Belsen provided a powerful stimulus for understanding the interaction between person and environment. There are many more—clients, teachers, students, colleagues, and friends—whose names are not here but who have been important, and I hope they are aware of that.

There are, however, some people who made contributions more directly to the ideas in this book as I was formulating them. Central to this are the members of the Person-in-Environment Group of the Human Behavior and the Social Environment sequence in the School of Social Work at Loyola University Chicago, most of whom met for monthly discussions over a period of more than a year. This group included Ann Bergart, Jude Gonzales, Alan J. Levy, Rose Rogers-Harris, Marion Rosenbluth, Susan Scholten, and Maria Vidal. Frances Stott of the Erikson Institute came late to the group, but still made a significant contribution. Of these, Alan Levy deserves special mention for his collaborative work with me and long-term appreciation and support of my work, which included his assistance in the preparation of my application for a leave of absence to write this.

Jeffrey S. Applegate, Jean B. Sanville, and Elizabeth M. Timberlake all reviewed the plan for the book, not just supporting it but also making suggestions about aspects of its development. Other colleagues and friends read parts of the book and then shared their thoughts about it: Jeffrey Applegate, Martha W. Chescheir, RoseMarie Perez-Foster, Gerald Schamess, and Marcia Spira. The enthusiasm that my editor at Columbia University Press, John Michel, has had for this work gave me a confidence that what I was doing was important.

Catherine Mesavage, my graduate assistant at Loyola University Chicago, helped with finding references for me and working on the indexes. Without the leave given me by Loyola, I would never have had the time to complete this project.

Susan A. McDaniels, whose love and willingness to tolerate my preoccupations are fundamental to my functioning, has, of course, been crucial.
