I would like to thank everyone who provided assistance and support. First of all, a thank you to my dissertation committee, Norval Glenn, Ruth McRoy, Ronald Angel, and Christine Williams, for reviewing and commenting on the earliest versions of this manuscript. Norval Glenn in particular was a part of the writing process from its inception. His thought-provoking questions and distinct objectivity made my arguments sharper, and his efforts went far beyond what I ever expected. More importantly, his words were constant reminders of the importance of this work for families and family studies. This completed project is undoubtedly a product of his tutelage and his faith in my abilities. Steve Hansen and Hugh Barlow, both senior faculty at Southern Illinois University at Edwardsville, encouraged me to develop my dissertation into a book and then guided me through the process of learning to successfully balance the requirements of teaching and scholarship. The Department of Sociology at Southern Illinois University collectively developed a teaching schedule that enabled me to devote a maximum amount of time to the project. Tenured faculty in the department are expressily committed to the success of junior colleagues and have created an inviting, mentoring environment that encouraged me to pursue and complete this and other projects with full endorsement and in my own time. Linda Markowitz, a friend and colleague, also read early drafts of the manuscript and related funding proposals. Helen Neville, professor of psychology, University of Missouri, Columbia, provided a careful critique of portions of the manuscript that clarified and sharpened its theoretical assumptions. Herbert Lomax’s insight as a parent and social work professional contributed greatly to the development of my survey instruments. A special thank you to Delores Lang Patton (my mother-in-law), whose understanding of the single-parent experience challenged me to reassess my interpretations of custodial mother and noncustodial father relationships. My graduate assistants Kate Marchioro and Faith Berry Barnes offered invaluable assistance by reviewing literature, collecting data, editing, and always being available at the last minute. Juliet E. K. Walker, Professor of History, University of Illinois-Urbana, provided sound advice about publishing that guided me throughout the writing process. Venessa Brown’s friendship has always provided me with inspiration and social support. Our discussions always reminded me of the relationship between theory and application, and between sociology and social work, and keeps much of my work on the fence, contributing to both disciplines.

Thanks also to my editor John Michel of Columbia University Press for his interest in this study, for holding my hand throughout, and for warmly relaxing the deadlines. Thanks as well to his assistants Alexander Thorp and Karen Brissette, and to Roy Thomas, who guided the book through production. Joan McQuary, also of Columbia University Press, with an eye for detail thoroughly edited the manuscript and did a tremendous job of adding necessary clarity and consistency to the work. Also, thanks to Robert Staples for a partial review of the manuscript and for comments that encouraged me to be more critical of my own work. The ideas and comments of all those above are reflected all through the book. I hope I have lived up to their standards and expectations.

This project also received financial support. Partial collection of the data for this book was made possible by a 1997 Southern Illinois University Summer Research Fellowship. Additionally, Rudy Wilson and the Office of Cultural Diversity at Southern Illinois University provided funding for the final stages of data analysis and writing.

Certainly this study would not have been possible without the fathers and mothers who gave me their time and shared their life stories and experiences. I have attempted to maintain their anonymity by removing, modifying, and/or transposing all identifying information. However, I hope they will feel that I have captured the essence of what they were trying to convey. Moreover, I hope their words will help others in similar circumstances to better understand their own lives.

In many ways this book has been a family project. My grandmother Frieda Lewis, my parents Johnnie and Elsie Hamer, my sisters Frieda and Stephanie, and my brothers Mark and Lawrence and their partners Khadeja and Sonnie, respectively, all contributed in one way or another. They provided loving care to my son Nile on weekends and during weeks in the summer when I needed to focus my energies on writing and deadlines. As I drafted these acknowledgments, I began to reflect upon all the sacrifices incurred by myself and my family while I worked on this book. Weeks and weekends of collecting and analyzing data led me to miss many family birthdays and holidays—events at which we traditionally come together, celebrate, and reinforce our commitment and love for one another. I missed my niece Rabha’s graduation. I have missed my parents’ anniversary for the past three years and my nephew Regge’s first track meet. I have never seen my niece Brianna tap dance or perform ballet. I was hundreds of miles away when my brother witnessed the birth of his firstborn child Lily, named after our paternal grandmother. Even though I have found great joy in this work, I regret each and every one of those special days that I chose to spend time on work, instead of with family. Yet everyone respected these decisions and encouraged me to work on the manuscript even though it sadly meant my absence. I cannot thank them enough for their patience, love, and understanding. What I know about families begins and ends with them.

This latter sentiment also applies to my partner in life, Clarence Lang. He has my deepest gratitude. He reviewed several drafts of each chapter as well as edited and offered extensive comments. His crystalline and constructive criticisms helped me to sharpen my understanding of class, gender, and race as they each relate to analyses of family life. He did all of this while managing his own work, sharing household responsibilities, and parenting. Most important, I would like to thank him for constant warm encouragement, emotional support, companionship, caring, and love.

Last but not least, thank you to my son Nile, for wanting to learn more about “what daddies do” and for being patient while I sought to find the answers.
