
Acknowledgments

Many lives have come together to shape these pages for their intended purpose and message. First, we extend our deep gratitude to the individuals, families, groups, and organizations whose stories inform and enlighten. You are the guiding light in this volume, facing unasked-for and unimaginable trials, courageously living with and through them, and reshaping—transforming—them into your messages of hope, strength, and resilience. Because of you, others who face trauma in their lives may find sources of comfort and direction that were unknown to you. This gift is immeasurable. To simply acknowledge you is truly inadequate. This book is dedicated to you, individually and collectively.

To each contributing author, our deep thanks for so generously offering your wisdom and experience and for rewarding us as editors with your insight, commitment, and timely submissions. Your compassion and selfless giving, your efforts to alleviate suffering and restore hope, shine through your work. It is a privilege to know you and to have worked with you on this project.

We extend our deep gratitude to Dr. Alex Gitterman. Your attention to the “soul” in these pages and your amazing skill and wise guidance as series editor are constant sources of inspiration. We greatly appreciate the work of Lauren Dockett, senior executive editor at Columbia University Press. Thank you for guiding this manuscript along its way through the stages of development from a loose stack of pages to a coherent, bound volume.

We are grateful to our colleagues at the University of Denver Graduate School of Social Work for the privilege to serve as the program developer and first coordinator (Judith Wise) and as the present coordinator (Marian Bussey) of the Trauma Response Certificate Program. It is your vision and foresight that inspired the earliest stages of thought that are at the root of this volume. To our students, many thanks for your helpful feedback in shaping the early years of the program.

To Amy Pickett, who read drafts and offered useful suggestions, many thanks for giving hours of your time to this work. We know that such hours are not easily available in your busy schedule, and we appreciate the adjustments you made to enhance and strengthen the manuscript.

Judith Wise: To Marian, coeditor, yes, but also treasured colleague and friend, thank you for your unwavering enthusiasm from the moment we first spoke of our ideas for this book to these finishing touches. Our writing and editing these works about transformation have run parallel to the transforming and deepening of my professional respect and admiration for you and of our personal friendship. To Chip go the greatest of thanks for your constant love and support, your flexibility and interest, and your care and feeding. In your warmhearted and generous way, you have contributed more to this work than words can express.

Marian Bussey: It is a pleasure to reflect on the process of writing and editing this book, and so much of that pleasure has been getting to know the keen insight and wonderful vision of my coeditor, Judith Wise. Thank you, Judy, for the hours we've spent talking, reading and rereading, and discovering much about ourselves just as we've discovered more about this trauma work to which we are both committed. I thank my family, who are truly the crucible from which my ideas have emerged, and I thank Luke, whose honesty, support, and love have made this work possible.
