

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

AS USUAL, THERE are so many people to thank for their help over the years in making this book possible that we most certainly have overlooked some of you, albeit unintentionally. For this mistake we ask your forgiveness in advance. First and foremost, we must thank the many deportees and their family members who participated in this study, inviting us into their lives, however briefly. For some participants, of course, who acted as informants and cultural brokers, such as Manolo, José, and Luis, a considerable amount of time was spent with them, hanging out, listening to their stories, observing their progress, and sharing the ups and downs of Dominican deportee life. We hope the end result was worth it and that we did justice to your extraordinary generosity of both spirit and time. Further, we must mention the direct contributions of Yolanda Martín, Ralph Larkin, Antonio de Moya, Omar Bautista, Rene Vicioso, Gipsy Escobar, Maria Heyaca, Lino Castro, Kalil Vicioso, and William Cossolias, all of whom performed critical tasks at various times, including face-to-face interviews, transcriptions in both Spanish and English, in situ expert advice, editing suggestions, and contributing photographs.

We must thank once again the academic institutions that we have long called home, John Jay College of Criminal Justice and the Graduate Center of the City University of New York. In particular, we want to thank members of the sociology department, most notably Barry Spunt, Danny Kessler, Louis Kontos, Douglas Thompkins, and Maria Volpe, who read drafts of this book and at various times lent their resources to the overall project, and members of the Department of Latin American and Latina/o Studies, including José Morín, Jeannette Sucre, Jodie Roure, and Marcia Esparza. In addition, we want to send a note of appreciation to the immigration study group of Jock Young, Michael Flynn, Fabiola Salek, Cory Feldman, and Fenix Arias. We also want to acknowledge the support of Jeremy Travis, president of John Jay College, and former John Jay dean James Levin, who, along with former John Jay president Gerry Lynch and former John Jay provost Basil Wilson, supported an early conference on deportees at John Jay in 2004. In thanking our institutions, we need to mention the special place in our research occupied by the law faculty at the Universidad Autónoma of Santo Domingo, especially Franklin García Fermín and Enrique Chalas, who provided integral support to the first-ever conference on Caribbean deportees in 2003 in the Dominican Republic. These conferences were crucial for opening up the public discourse on deportees, providing the public space for scholars and activists to come together on such a growing yet occluded social and political problem, and helping create the networks that allowed us to extend our sample, which finally made the project possible. The erstwhile criminal justice reform organization, the Justice, Equality, Human dignity, and Tolerance (JEHT) Foundation, was a major underwriter of the John Jay event, but during the financial crisis it sadly fell victim to the multibillion dollar skullduggery of Bernie Madoff et al.

Finally, we must thank our executive editor Lauren Dockett, editorial assistant Avni Majithia-Sejpah, and production editor Roy Thomas, as well as the good staff of Columbia University Press, who once again opted to support and encourage our project through thick and thin, sticking with us over the numerous missed deadlines and ensuring a finished product that we hope will cause some reflection on one of the most tragic crises of our times.

Last but not least, we want to remember those deportees in our study who passed away during the making of this book. The last of them, Pedro, was executed by the police in January 2011 in Santiago. All of their deaths were untimely, unnecessary, and preventable; they were still in the prime of their lives, and it is only the soul-destroying conditions that characterize life as a deportee with double and triple stigmas that forced them to succumb. Thus, this book is both a tribute to and in memoriam of the following:
