I HAVE HAD MANY TEACHERS in my education as a disaster responder. My first disaster response team was the Community Crisis Response Team of Western Massachusetts, and I am grateful to my teammates for helping me get my feet wet. The American Red Cross trained and deployed me to national disasters, while the Western Massachusetts Emergency Medical Services team trained me and regularly uses me to debrief uniformed responders.

The Center for Peace Building and Reconciliation (CPBR) worked devotedly to help people in eastern and southern Sri Lanka recover from the tsunami, and I was privileged to work alongside its volunteers. I particularly thank Dishani Jayaweera and Jayantha Senevirathne for their friendship and inspiration. Joanne Corbin has worked with survivors of the armed conflict in northern Uganda. I am indebted to her for including me in one phase of her psychosocial capacity building project. I learned a great deal from my Ugandan colleagues, particularly Father Remigio and social worker Stella Ojera. Dr. Ann Markes, Dr. Matt Kane, Eileen Giardina, David LaLima, Dr. Mwaki Amos Deo, and Okello Patrick Onguti were all cherished collaborators in a medical capacity building project in northern Uganda. In China, I have been privileged to work alongside Dean Xiulan Zhang, Braven Zhang, and Xiyang Wang of Beijing Normal University and Cecilia Chan of Hong Kong University, and with my many other Chinese colleagues. Recently, I was fortunate to be able to work with CapraCare, a small Haitian NGO, and I thank its executive director, Jean Pierre-Louis; creative director, Laurie Pillow; local field captains, Smith and Janine; and the many volunteers with whom I worked. I would also like to mention Pere Daniel Felix of Fonfrede, Haiti, who works tirelessly on behalf of his community. Jeff Grabelsky and K. C. Wagner of the Cornell School of Industrial and Labor Relations and their colleague, psychologist Lorraine Beaulieu, did impressive work to help construction workers with their psychosocial reactions after 9/11, which is described in this book.

Many of my colleagues at Smith College School for Social Work have influenced me over the years. The Clinical Research Institute has funded a number of projects that supported both interventions and evaluations of those efforts, which are described in this book. My thanks to Dean Carolyn Jacobs and Associate Dean Susan Donner for encouraging and supporting me in my disaster response work and giving me the time to do it! Yoosun Park has been an important collaborator, particularly in the development of the concept of psychosocial capacity building. Bao Chau Van was a valued student collaborator in our work. And Kay Naito and Daphne Nayar were great help as research assistants on a number of psychosocial capacity building projects.

There are always those in the field who serve as inspiration, and I would like to mention a few. Bill Yule and Atle Dyregrov of the Children and War Foundation have been generous with their time and resources. I have great admiration for their work. Charles Figley, Kay Saakvitne, and Laurie Pearlman have done much to help many of us who have suffered the secondary consequences of responding to disaster. I have appreciated their writing, talks, and in Laurie's case, friendship. Ervin Staub, Paula Green, and Olivia Drier have all helped me better understand the dynamics of intergroup conflict, peace building, and healing. I have appreciated their friendship and collegiality. I particularly acknowledge my close friend Adin Thayer, who tirelessly helps war-affected communities recover in Africa. My thanks go to Tracy Kidder for his work on behalf of Partners in Health and for putting me in touch with Bepe Raviola, who was very receptive to my ideas about psychosocial capacity building. There are many other mentors whose works are listed in the references of this book. Although I have not met all of them personally, they have strongly influenced my thinking.

Students are great teachers, and I have learned tons from them while teaching courses about psychosocial capacity building and disaster at Smith College, Beijing Normal University, and Hong Kong University. I would like to thank the thousands of volunteers with whom I have worked at disaster sites in the United States and internationally in China, Haiti, Sri Lanka, and Uganda. Also, I appreciate how many friends have informally debriefed me over the years.

I owe a special debt to a woman who was murdered in London in the 1970s, whom I have written about as “Violet.” She was my client when her husband killed her. Her life and death have had a strong influence on all my work. I am very fortunate to have ongoing relationships with her children and grandchildren. Also, I learned a great deal of professional wisdom in my younger years from Irving and Helen Miller, Sidney Miller, Alex and Naomi Gitterman, Stanley Ofsevit, Richard Cloward, Frances Fox Piven, Ann Hartman, and Mitchell Ginsberg. Abby Miller and Melanie Suchet have supported my work through the years.

Lauren Dockett and the staff at Columbia University Press have been a pleasure to work with. Two anonymous reviewers offered helpful feedback and criticism. I am very grateful to Frank Citino of Smith College, who has been a wizard with most of the book’s diagrams. I particularly acknowledge Eileen Dunn, an editorial alchemist who reviewed an early draft of the manuscript; she consistently transforms rubble into gold. I also thank Merrill Gillaspay, my copy editor, who pruned and strengthened the manuscript. And last, my love and gratitude to my family—Davina, Lucy, Corina, and Sophie—whose love, support, and efforts in the world make my life meaningful and my work possible.

PSYCHOSOCIAL CAPACITY BUILDING IN RESPONSE TO DISASTERS
