

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I would like to thank the students, colleagues, collaborators, and community leaders who were with me on this journey of learning, and contributed to now precious memories of the development of the work that is woven together in this book. These include my Southern Illinois University students Sarah Cox, Andrea Curtis, Jessica Davis, Paula Ford, Claudette Henderson, and Eugene Kepner; my University of Arkansas students Charlotte Butler, Karen Ciaravino, Elizabeth Melton, Jolanda Nally, Michelle Smith, and Michele Wise-Wright; my University of Illinois students Robin Ahern, Dean Brown, Shankar Nair, Joleen O’Faire, and Claudia Warren; and my University of North Dakota students Chris Rosaasen, Jennifer Schlinger, and Diane Wiersgalla.

Thank you to my Hong Kong collaborators Cecilia Chan and Wallace Chan, and to my predecessor as Leader of the Social Worker Section at the National Hospice and Palliative Care Organization, Mary Raymer. There, with national hospice social work leaders Samira Beckwith, Susan Gerbino, Ruth Huber, Stacy Orloff, Joan Richardson, and Mary-Ann Sontag, we made great strides. Also I was privileged to work with national hospice leaders Stephen Connor, Kathy Egan, Donna Kwilosz, and Dale Larson, with whom I explored ways to develop a high functioning interdisciplinary team.

Thanks to Larry Braden, the visionary hospice medical director of a hospice in Camden, Arkansas, and to the leaders of culturally diverse community groups in Champaign, Illinois; Fayetteville, Arkansas; and Carbondale, Illinois, who partnered with me and have created greater hospice access for African Americans and Latino/as in their communities. And thanks to my academic colleagues at Southern Illinois University—Connie Baker, Sarah Buila, Elaine Jurkowski, and Judy McFadden; my colleague Mark Kaplan at Portland State University, and David Perry at University of North Dakota. Thanks to Virginia Richardson, the editor of the End-of-life series at Columbia University Press, who invited me on this journey, and provided constant encouragement and kept believing in me. And finally, thanks to my graduate assistant Liz Garrett, who helped put the whole thing together. The wonderful adventure of working with all of you has brought great meaning to my life.

HOSPICE SOCIAL WORK

