

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book is the third in a developmental progression in which the structure of the earlier books forms the foundations of those that follow. Because of this, my acknowledgments must go back many years to managerial mentors like Hugh McGregor, Morris Cowley, James Mackness, David Richardson, and Peter Foster, who gave me my early opportunities both to study at the University of Chicago and to begin my career as a professional manager with a series of challenging assignments. Business colleagues like Jim Mackay, Larry Hall, Jack Woodcock, Horace Ho, and Wayne Mang taught me a great deal both through their examples and the opportunities they gave me. Wayne, together with my colleagues at Russelsteel, supplied a safe base for researching my first book, Crisis & Renewal.

When I changed careers from manager to educator, several academic colleagues were of enormous help, especially Rod White and Jim Rush at what is now the Richard Ivey School of Business and Brenda Zimmerman at the Schulich School of Business. She introduced me to complexity theory and the work of ecologist C. S. "Buzz" Holling, on whose frameworks the concept that we named the ecocycle is based. John Alexander and the extended team at the Center for Creative Leadership provided a home for the second book, Learning from the Links, where I learned the huge difference between “know what” and “know how” and the importance of experience in the development of managers.

The “home” for this third book was home. Writers are often rather solitary creatures, and, with social networking all the rage, it’s easy to feel left out of the rush to connect with everyone else. The connections that help me are typically deeper than these. They are the writers and thinkers whose books surround me as I write and speak to me when I consult them and sometimes even when I don’t. They are the living colleagues who appreciate what it is that you are trying to do and send you helpful references and words of encouragement or read the endless drafts and offer editorial comment. There are many of these people to thank.

Horace Ho hired me to design and deliver development programs in Hong Kong and China, where many of the practical ideas were developed and honed. Patrick Wang, CEO of Johnson Electric, trusted me with his people and his colleagues. Jim Mackay and Judy Huntington supplied regular encouragement and opportunities to implement some of the concepts in the public and not-for-profit sectors. Garnet Garven, former dean of the University of Regina’s Faculty of Business Administration gave me an opportunity to teach keystone courses in their new EMBA program at the Kenneth Levene Graduate School of Business. Here I explored the teaching implications of the ecological mental model and tested a number of different approaches.

My friend Ann Graham has been a constant source of inspiration and contacts through her extensive network. She, together with my colleagues at Strategy+Business, Art Kleiner, Rob Norton, and Ted Kinni, have ensured that I have stayed current with what is being written about management and have continually challenged me to express myself as clearly as possible in my writing for that magazine.

Many people read drafts of the book and gave me very helpful feedback, including John Alexander, Maarten Asser, Mary Crossan, Adriaan Davidse, Barbara Demarest, Bob Dryburgh, Garnet Garven, Ann Graham, Charles Hampden-Turner, Wendy Keith, Ted Kinni, Art Kleiner, Kaihan Krippendorff, Rob Norton, Alan Pearson, Tom Pirner, Jim Rush, Liz Rykert, Jen St Clair, Pat Thompson, Rod White, Allister Wilson, and Jim Womack. Ann Graham read the manuscript several times and gave me a particularly helpful, detailed critique.

Carol Franco has been enormously helpful, and I would also like to thank Martin and Farah Perelmuter for their continued support and advice; my agent, John Willig; and Myles Thompson, publisher at Columbia University Press, for recognizing the value of the book; and Bridget Flannery-McCoy for all her hard work to make it a reality. Pamela Nelson, production editor, and Carol Hoke, copy editor, did a meticulous job on the manuscript. Noah Arlow produced a compelling cover design, and Jennifer Jerome crafted the interior.

Finally, the pleasure of having home as a base is that you are physically close to the family even if mentally you aren't always "there." My family has been totally supportive, and our young grandchildren have been a constant joy. My wife, Diana, read and edited every draft and offered countless helpful comments and much advice. Her love and support have been inexhaustible. If there are any mistakes of commission or omission, however, they are my responsibility.
