

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

To begin at the beginning, I wish to acknowledge, with appreciation and gratitude, Charlie Munger and his wonderful concept of the latticework of mental models. That idea inspired this book, and it continues to inspire me in the conduct of my professional life every single day.

Then, for the actual writing of the book, I must start by expressing my deepest appreciation to my writing partner, Maggie Stuckey. This is the eighth book we have written together over the past eighteen years, and quite honestly I don't think I could have written one book without her. Maggie works and lives in Portland, Oregon. I live in Pennsylvania and work on the East Coast. A collaboration that is separated by a continent might pose a problem for many, but Maggie's hard work, dedication, and her special gift of connecting immediately to the work has always made me feel she lives next door. As I mentioned in the Preface, this was a particularly difficult book to write, but Maggie's talent for immediately connecting to the material has made the challenge much easier. She always was able to come up with an additional tidbit that enlivened the story. You the reader and I the author are very fortunate that Maggie has willingly shared her natural gifts with us.

I am fortunate to have many friends, colleagues, and professors who were willing to share their valuable time with me, each patiently explaining the nuances of their particular area of expertise and how what they learned might also benefit people struggling to make sense of the investment world.

A special thanks goes to Bill Miller, who introduced me to the Santa Fe Institute and the world of complex adaptive systems. Bill is a walking library who has allowed me to “check out,” for free, countless books and ideas.

Michael Mauboussin, investment strategist, professor, and talented writer is equally curious about the world of investing. His generosity in sharing ideas and willingness to walk me through the most difficult parts were incredibly helpful. Thanks, Michael.

I would like to thank Richard Beeman, Paul Sniegowski, Larry Gladney, and William Wunner at the University of Pennsylvania. At Villanova University, my alma mater, both Maria Toyoda and Markus Kruezer are passionate about a liberal arts interpretation of the world. Their academic passion was an important and timely spark motivating me to dig just a little deeper.

At St. John’s College, a special thanks is extended to President Christopher Nelson. Chris was an eager supporter of the project and introduced me to several people who helped me better understand the benefits of a Great Books education. Thanks to Walter Sterling, tutor; Greg Curtis, honorary alumnus; and to Don Bell, Lee Munson, and Steve Bohlin. Go Johnnies!

I especially enjoyed my conversation with Benjamin Doty, senior investment director at Koss Olinger and adjunct professor at the University of Michigan. Ben is a professional investor who took his valuable time to teach a course on the benefits of reading literature and how doing so makes for being a better investor. His reading list is a thoughtful and welcome distraction from the stacks of information that dominate our reading hours.

I am greatly indebted to Laurie Harper at Sebastian Literary Agency. Laurie is the perfect agent who navigates the world of publishing with great integrity. She is smart and loyal. Her professionalism, forthright honesty, and great sense of humor have always been appreciated. She is, in a word, special.

I also wish to thank, wholeheartedly, Myles Thompson at Columbia University Press. When Myles asked if I might consider revisiting Investing: The Last Liberal Art, I immediately jumped at the opportunity. Not only is Myles a talented publisher, he is also my friend. Thank you for your continued support.

Writing is a time-consuming endeavor. The time you spend writing a book requires your family to be patient and understanding. For their unwavering support I owe more than I can say to my wife Maggie and to John, Rob, Kim, and Jaques.

For all that is good and right about this book, you may thank the people I have mentioned here. For any errors and omissions, I alone am responsible.
