

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I AM DEEPLY GRATEFUL to all of the people who supported and tolerated me through the writing of this book. While all of its shortcomings are mine, this book was a community effort in more ways than one and for that I am forever grateful.

This project started as my doctoral dissertation at the University of Minnesota. For their constant support I would like to thank Rose Brewer, Doug Hartmann, and Keith Mayes. I am also grateful to Liz Boyle and Ann Hironaka for their mentorship in my early years of graduate school and to Robin Stryker and Chris Uggen, who have always looked out for me. I am especially indebted to my dissertation advisor Ron Aminzade. It was when I sat in his seminar on social movements that I knew I made the right decision to go to graduate school. He has always encouraged me and held me up. I am thankful that I've had him on my side and honored to represent his mentorship in my academic endeavors.

This research wouldn't have been possible without the support, guidance, and assistance of the people at the Social Welfare History Archives. I want to thank archivists David Klaasen and Linnae Anderson, as well as the numerous student workers that assisted me in the development and execution of this project. I also want to thank the social workers who graciously gave their time, resources, and wisdom in support of this project.

I also benefited from institutional support in the sociology and African American studies departments at the University of Georgia and the sociology department and the Center on Race and Social Problems at the University of Pittsburgh. Both of these intellectual homes have nurtured the ideas here. I am especially grateful for Derrick Alridge, Kathy Blee, Cheryl Dozier, Aisha Durham, and Kecia Thomas who have pushed me intellectually and spent time both writing and thinking with me. I am particularly thankful for my colleague and writing partner Waverly Duck, whose friendship and support were essential to the end stages of this project. In addition, I owe an intellectual debt to several academic giants who laid the groundwork for this project: Eduardo Bonilla-Silva, Kimberlé Crenshaw, Joe Feagin, Elizabeth Higginbotham, Peniel Joseph, Robin D. G. Kelley, Joyce Ladner, Manning Marable, Aldon Morris, Jeffrey O. G. Ogbar, Robert C. Smith, Kwame Ture, and Cheryl Townsend-Gilles.

Jennifer Perillo, Stephen Wesley, and Kathryn Jorge at Columbia University Press and several anonymous reviewers provided insightful feedback important to the development of this project. I am also thankful for the wide range of colleagues who have provided comments, guidance, and critiques of the book that have shaped it.

It is also important to me to thank the University of Minnesota's Upward Bound and McNair Scholars programs and staff, particularly Aloida Zaragoza and Bruce and Sharyn Schelske. The journey to this book began with them. They were each instrumental in helping me look beyond my situation when I was a kid who didn't even see a diploma. I truly treasure the guidance, understanding, and unconditional friendship that I have had in my life since I was thirteen because of them. I would be a different person had my life not been touched by their influence.

There are a number of women in my life who, because of the love and support they have given me, should really be listed as co-authors of this book. DeAnna Cummings, Tiffany Davis, Lisette Haro, Wendy Leo Moore, Carrie Williams, and Keegan Xavi—you are my counsel, my mirror, and my sanity. Thank you for being my unconditional friends. I would also like to thank Ryan Schleif and Amanda Hill Harris who opened their homes to me when I needed space to just sit and write. Your generosity was crucial to this project.

My mother Jean Annan, my brothers Eugene and Maurice Dunn, my in-laws Brenda Bell-Caffee and Jessie Caffee, and my spiritual mother Amove Kubat have provided an unshakable foundation for my life and this project. I can't thank them enough for all they give to my family. Without them, this project wouldn't have happened.

My partner in life, Tyehimba Bell, is my solid ground. He has been the cool to my hot and the steady to my shaky. He has been my support, my distraction, and my peace through this whole process. He has believed in me like no one else and constantly reminds me that I have everything I need inside myself. Our son, Tyehimba Ralasi, is an amazing young man who started this journey as a much younger (and shorter) child. He has heard, “Mama’s too tired,” or “I have to work now,” more times than I want to admit. But he has somehow understood that I love him more than anything else—ever. If my work on this book can teach him any lessons, it is already a great success.

I have the great fortune of having many good friends, a family who loves me, and several people around me and across the world who have touched my life and have supported this project, in ways big and small. There’s no way I can name them all, but I thank you—my friends (both old and new), my family and extended family, and people whose ideas inspire me, whose music has made writing easier, and whose courage gives me strength. I truly am rich in loved ones.
