

❖ ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

During the spring of 1999 I was a visiting fellow at the International Social Sciences Institute, University of Edinburgh, Scotland. Years later I was a visiting professor and resident fellow in St Cuthbert's Society, at the University of Durham, England. These sabbaticals provided particularly rich occasions for venturing into new research exploring the profession's heritage in values and ethics. Access to original historical documents was buttressed by discussions about social work and social welfare, with British social workers and educators, and also with scholars from other disciplines and professional occupations. I specifically acknowledge Sarah Banks, Eric Blyth, Chris Clark, Derek Clifford, Vivienne Cree, and Michael Preston-Shoot for embracing me and my work in sharing their rich and varied perspectives. On a more recent sabbatical I was able to meet with academic colleagues in Greece and Italy and was offered exceptional support by Eleni Papouli, Annamaria Campanini, Cristina Tilli, and Michelle Ciarpi. They all enriched my understanding about social work practice from a global perspective.

For these and so many opportunities I will be eternally grateful to Bryn Mawr College (BMC). As provost and now as president, Kimberly Cassidy has been supportive of my research. Her encouragement of collegue-ship across disciplines enabled close and productive relationships in which I could expand on the scholarship begun in the sabbaticals. I especially thank my BMC colleagues Michael Allen, Grace Armstrong, Christine Koggel, and Mary Osirim for their ideas and analyses about international perspectives, reinforcing the importance of multidisciplinary collaboration in our global society. I also acknowledge two Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research (GSSWSR) research assistants, Lisa Couser and John Edwards, who helped with literature searches.

Notwithstanding continued technological developments, taking on the role of social worker involves integrating skills with multiple bodies of knowledge. In their mission to create both individual and social change, social workers continually struggle with effects of meaning and process, while balancing often conflicting ethics and mores, made ever more challenging by globalization. It is my hope that this book's emphasis on values enriches knowledge and improves practice through its re-envisioning of social work and the social welfare in a global society. The narratives and case studies are from the many front-line practitioners in a range of locations who so generously gave of their time. I thank them all and wish I could publicly name them individually. Reflected in these pages is important work by U.S. colleagues including Elaine Congress, Bart Grossman, Lynne Healy, Carmen

Hendricks, Kathy Pottick, Robin Mama, and Frederic Reamer.

I expressly thank my Foundation Practice students of nearly 40 years for stimulating me to develop this book.

Jennifer Perillo has been an extraordinary editor. She believed in this project and along with her assistant, Stephen Wesley, was always available to help with deadlines and offer wise guidance. I thank them both that we are finally at this stage.

The brilliance of my son, Graham Brownstein, has always been an inspiration. I thank him and his father, Donald Brownstein, for their valuable insights. My husband, David Hardcastle, Professor Emeritus, University of Maryland School of Social Work, patiently helped me stay focused on social work's breadth. He has been a source of infinite support and encouragement, sharing his vast wisdom and intellectual acuity about this profession we both dearly love. I am forever grateful for his enduring friendship, kindness, and guidance.
